Interaction between Apatite Nanoparticles and a Phospholipid Bilayer

Harvey Tawfik ¹, Martin Stefanic ², Ralf Seemann ^{1,3}, Christophe Drouet ⁴, Kevin Ward ² and Jean-Baptiste Fleury ^{1,*}

¹Universitat des Saarlandes, Experimental Physics, 66123 Saarbruecken, Germany

– jean-baptiste.fleury@physik.uni-saarland.de

² Biopharma Technology Limited, Winchester SO23 0LD, United Kingdom

³Max Planck Institute for Dynamics and Self-Organization, 37077 Göttingen, Germany

⁴CIRIMAT Carnot Institute, UMR CNRS/INPT/UPS 5085, University of Toulouse, France

Abstract

Apatite nanoparticles are showing good results for the cryopreservation of red blood cells. In this work, we use a microfluidic technique to explore the interaction between these nanoparticles and a model cell membrane. These results may give a better understanding of the adsorption properties, and possible internalization mechanisms, of these nanoparticles with red blood cells.